A CUBAN DUEL.

I made my initial appearance on the field of honor in Havana a few days since as second to a howling Cuban swell. It as second to a howling Cuban swell. It was a duel that set the queen of the Antilles agog. On Sunday night there was music in the park, and after dinner an English lord, a Chicago gambler and I were strolling tranquilly along in the starlight when a magnificently appointed starlight when a magnificently appointed victoria rose up and a man whom we all knew jumped out.

"I was at your hotel," he said, raising his hat amiably, "but you had out gone, and so I come here."
"Haw!" said the Englishman, fixing his

"Haw!" said the Englishman, fixing his ginss in his eye and beaming through it upon the young Cuban, "I'm shuah we're always glad to see you—indeed, we—ah—we are vawstly indebted to you already for so many agreeable attentions"—
"Indeed," said the Cuban, with a deprecatory wave of the hand, "it is I that am complimented by meeting men of the world."

The gambler nodded to him sagely, and patted his shoulder with a thin, white hand, on which glittered a diamond as big as an acorn. Having passed creditably through the complimentary stage of the conversation—an absolute necessity in the tropics-we wandered over to the Louvre cafe. Here the Cuban told us of a masked ball that was on that night. As a masket ball that was on that might. As near as we could make out it was a sort of half way respectable dance, where one might expect to meet almost anything. There was always more or less mystery in our talk, as the Cuban spoke very little English. He, however, knew some Ger-man—the gambler knew the tongue well— and was admirable in French. The British nobleman's knowledge of the language of the merry Gaul was on the same eccentric scale as my own, and we all know a little Spanish. The talk was commonly, therefore, a touching mixture of French, Spanish, German and English.

"And I rawther like it, too, d'ye know?" the Englishman remarked that night. "I—ah—nevah really understand might. "I—ah—nevan really understand what people are talking about in my own tongue, and I'm quite shuah no one has the slightest ides what—ah—what I happen to be prating about, though we all keep up such a tremendous seeming, you know. This way it doesn't make".

There was a sudden movement in the chair was a verturned and fell.

crowd, a chair was overturned and fell with a crash on the floor, and the Cuban at ar table sprang to his feet and glared savingely at a sallow faced man who stood twenty feet away with his blazing eyes fixed on the Cuban's face. Neither man moved. The space between them was cleared instantly, and every man in the room was on his feet except the nobleman, the gambler and myself. There's goin' t' be shootin'," muttered the Chicago man softly.

"Looks that way," said the Englishman laconically, as he turned his handsome and imperturbable face more toward the stranger. When the Cuban jumped to his feet his hand fell mechanically on my shoulder, and his grip tightened as he stared at his foe till I thought his nails would bore through my coat. Thus he stood for awhile, and then the statuesque man across the room was surrounded by his friends and hurried out. He went with his face turned toward us to the last. It was a brutal face. The Cuban sank in his seat and lighted a cigarette, the wait-ers moved alertly about and I rubbed my

"Are y' armed, m' son!" asked the gambler in his soothing voice as he laid his hand on the young fellow's knee. "No, else I kill him as he stand."

"Well, we'll just g' over with you t' your house till you get in shape, see? I don't know much, you unerstan', but I come from a corner o' the airth where men take care o' themselves, an' I know th' look of a man that'll shoot. If that white livered snipe gets the drop on you, yer gone."

"Good," said the boy—he was but 21—
"I will go arm myself, but I go alone—else I seem coward. Will join you here

We nodded and he left us, while the gambler watched him closely. Then the Chicago man twisted about in his seat, lighted a cigar nervously, moved his bi diamond ring once or twice on his thin finger, and said in his peculiar, insinuating voice:
"Don't you think I had better go with

We nodded again and he slid out of the door and moved hurriedly across to the park in the direction taken by the young Cuban. The Englishman pulled himself together and told me of the trouble be tween our Cuban friend and the sallo faced man who had glared at him in such a thentrical manner.
"Tant chap," said the lord, with a nod toward the place where the sallow faced man had stood, "is one of the best swordsthe the very well known here, and he's a number of duels both in Paris, his aid and at home. He has a surly dis-position, but his skill with the pistel and foil has made him more or less famous, and he is a good deal of a local hero. He is consumptive and booked for the 'voy-age' within a few years, anyhow, and that seems to have made him reckless. His trouble with our friend Tomaso here is of less than five hours' standing. They were playing scarte after breakfast to day; there was some dispute, and the boy here threw the cards in the duelist's face. I heard of it all in the clubs this afternoon while you were asleep. Several of Tomaso's friends have tried to get him away, but the boy has the right spirit, and he's a good deal more of an Angloon than most of the people here. I ar think that is the reason that he wed us to the park to-night, and it certainly the reason that I was glad to him when he told me so. His coun en are very excitable, and he is gifted a good deal of coolness. I suppose he finds us the same way. I cannot say was booked when that big eyed fire eater stood glaring at us." smoked on tranquilly, waiting the return of Tomaso. I do not think either one of us felt particularly cheerful, for there is an element of uncertainty, not to say unensiness, about it when you find yourself in the situation of lying around town in a strange country near midnight with a companion for whom somebody is that I am particularly gratified with the turn affairs have taken, though, for I rather thought that one of the three of us searching with murderous intent. Presently Tomaso returned, but before he entered the louvre the gambler slipped in ahead of him, and I doubt if he know to this day that he had a vigilant, sharp eyed and cool headed guard in his lonely walk through the park that night and back again to the crowded cafe. The gambler moved his chair against the wall. crossed his legs, lighted another of his in merable cigars, and all three of us chatted in a desultory way, while Tomaso moved from table to table, nodding to this friend and shaking hands with that as he approached. News of the trouble had apparently got abroad, for the cafe was crowded and every eye was fixed on the placid young Cuban. He was a good type of the tropical man town, clubman, yachtsman, and His shoes were russet leather with high heels and tied with tiny bits of blue ribbon, affording a glimpse of silken hose. His coat, waistcoat and trousers were white flannel, cut by a Parisian tailor and almost molded to his slim figure, and a $200 Panama hat with a tiny crest in gold worked in the top of the crown, was pushed back on the top of his head. He wore the snowlest of linens, and the general whiteness of his attire was releved by a brilliant scarlet scarf in which there was a black diamond set in white enamel. He wore several showy rings. There was something that relieved his appearance of all suggestions of effeminacy, and I think it was the steady gaze of his eyes. His face was clean cut and regular, the mouth firm and the expression very winning when he chose to smile. He was the only son of a rich widow, had the entree to the best houses in Havana, and was more of a favorite among men than among women. This is the best recommendation any man can have. I had met him in New York, and so posed as his oldest friend among the queerly con-stituted trio that night, but we had all been in Havana a month, and we been together constantly, so that he was quite as well acquainted with the English nobleman and the Chicago gambler as with me. When he finally got to our table he pulled out his little jeweled watch and "It is beyond 12 o'clock, and so we go to the ball.

When we got to the Tacon theatre, where the masked ball was going on, the floor was crowded by men and women in carnival attire dancing a curious and suggestive Cuban waltz. We went in the box immediately over the governor gen-eral's, in the second tier. In an instant every head in the room was turned to-wards Tomaso. There was nothing new about the ball.

It was the same old series of wriggles and contortions which invariably characterize the Cuban dance, and which make it in its vulgar form the grossest of known public amusements. We had all been up late the night before, and I am afraid I was rather sleepy. At all events, I dozed off a bit at the back of the box, while the music strummed away monotonously. The others talked and watched the crowd It must have been nearly 2 o'clock, when a young yachtsman pulled open the door of the box, stuck a half scared face in and nodded significantly to Tomaso. The latter raised his eyebrows perceptibly and smiled his thanks for the warning. It was evident that the duelist had arrived. The gambler pulled my sleeve and told me in a hearse whitnes to wake up but. me in a hoarse whisper to wake up, but the suggestion was not needed, for I saw by the movement in the crowd that we ere in for the row at last. A crowd of club men and loungers surged in on the floor, and with them was the hero of the hour, with his face whiter than ever and his big eyes rolling from face to face. The Englishman had evidently been thinking deeply and he was very much perturbed.

As the little group of rounders pushed their way on the floor he arose and leaned over the young Cuban with a more fatherly air than I had ever seen him exhibit before.

"I wish you would come home, my boy," he said, with a half sullen and half husky voice. "I feel like a criminal. I ought to have spanked you and put you to bed three hours ago. The trouble is that the duel is such a recognized institution in these countries than an outsider can never interfere, but it is a pity that you have to get into any sort of a scrimmage with that white faced cat down there on the floor."

"It must be, you know," said the youngster resignedly. "It is the custom of the country, and if I showed the least tendency to shirk I would be cut by every friend and relative on the island." The Englishman sank back again into his seat. Then I proposed a walk through the corridors. We moved out slowly with the gambler beside Tomaso, and the Englishman and I walking together beside them. I was rather surprised to see that none of the Cubans came to Tomaso's side. but I learned the reason from one of them as we walked along. He said that as Tomaso had deliberately chosen foreigners, meaning us, for his associates in the trouble, they thought it would only be courtesy to respect his wishes, but that they all held selves at his services at any time. This I was told to communicate to him by the speaker, whose good breeding appa rently prevented him from approaching Tomaso himself. We moved down the broad flight of stairs and into the open court adjoining the Tacon theatre. At the same moment the other party hurried tumultuously out of the further door, and we heard occasional slurs and gibes leveled at Americans and Englishmen, including four or five imitations of how we spoke Spanish. The imitations were so deftly and cleverly made that both the Englishman and I grinned, but the gambler and Tomaso were apparently quite unconscious of the fusilade of remarks that were leveled at us. It began to look as if we were in for more of a row than we had at first supposed. We were walking directly toward the crowd, and in the front rank stood the duellist, with a sort of stage smile on his thin lips, and his eyes fixed directly on the slim boy who was walking by the gambler's side.

I had rather have had that famous Chicago faro dealer and gambler for a guard at that moment than a regiment of the czar's imperial guards. There was some-thing about his immovable face and the protecting manner in which he hovered about the boy that caused even the hot about the boy that caused even the hot blooded and half tipsy crowd that we were approaching to moderate their voices. We had approached within five feet of the crowd, when Tomaso, without a word of warning to us or any one else, sprang for-ward like a cat directly into the crowd, and, with a single back handed motion, ed the duelist in the face with his left and stood where he landed, staring at him. The face turned crimson, and the man gasped from sheer amazement and stepped back a pace. Then there was a howl from the crowd, and the men and women from the ball poured out of doors into the open court. The duelist was so amazed by the suddenness of the attack— for he evidently expected that he would have to provoke the quarrel—that he pointed angrily to a tall Spaniard by his de, turned on his heel and pushed his way back into the theatre without a word. Tomeso, who was not flustered in the least by the crowd that was pushing and jostling him, turned to me and raised his hat with a meaning smile. I suddenly discovered that I had been selected as a second in a duel. The tall Spaniard bowed and we approached each other while the crowd fell back and the gambler hurried Tomaso off toward the entrance. They drove to our hotel and the Spaniard, his brother, the Englishman and myself went out on the Prada, stepped into a carriage and drove rapidly down to an all night club—which was the only one open at that hour—where we arranged the pre-liminaries within the hour. They were simple enough. Dueling swords were a quiet place on the beach two miles from the cemetery The Spaniard agreed to bring a surgeon, which made three spec-tators on each side, not including the principals. The Spaniards were courteous and exceedingly polite in making all the arrangements, and the whole matter was settled within ten minutes. We parted to meet again within four hours. The Englishman and I drove back to the hotel and went up to the second corridor, where we discovered the man from Chi-cago still smoking and leaning against the rallings outside of his room. He looked at us and then said:

"They are to fight at 7 o'clock."

"Any stakes?" Both of us grinned, but the gambler seemed perfectly serious. "Eccause," he continued, "if there are any stakes I want to back this youngster right here, and I'll show you why."

He pulled back the fluttering curtain of his room. We looked in and saw Tomaso stretched out upon the bed sleeping as weetly as a 2-year-old child! "That's what I call nerve," said the Chicago man, "and that's what I like to back.'

I think it dawned on all of us at that time that the affair was no longer a farce. We allowed the boy to sleep until 5 o'clock, by which time we had succeeded in finding a fencing master, and then we roused Tomaso, and all of us went round to the gymnast's apartments in Acquila street. We had discovered that Tomaso had never held a foil in his hand. He was taught two things—how to thrust and how to parry. For an hour he exer-cised there, and then we all drank coffee, took two hacks and drove out on the sea road. I have never seen a more thoroughly self contained and well balanced man in my life than the young Cuban, who sat by my side smoking cigarettes in that beautiful drive in the early morning. There was a gentle breeze blowing in from the sea, over which the sun's rays were dancing like a network of diamonds and the few laborers we passed nodded and smiled with the conventional courtesy of the children of the tropics.

We were five minutes late, for the others were there when we arrived. The duelist looked more ghastly by daylight than he had the night before, but he bowed pleasantly to us all. I told his seconds that Tomaso had had no experience with the sword, but they shrugged their shoulders carelessly, and one of them said something about the fortunes of war It was quite evident that they knew of the ignorance of the boy, and that their principal was also acquainted with the con dition of affairs. To tell the truth, this was rather a source of satisfaction to me for I did not believe the duelist would butcher the young Cuban outright, but would probably exercise his skill in giv ing him some slight wound which would satisfy the demands of honor.

I was wrong. A quicker duel was never fought. The men faced each other and stood for a moment with their swords crossed. Then the duelist, who, by the way, was as agile and firm a swordsman as I ever saw, made a conventional thrust at the boy. Tomaso parried it and sprang forward again precisely as he had done in the attack after the theatre. His teeth were set and his eyes gleamed. His onslaught was so unexpected and flerce that his antagonist threw his sword too high for the parry, and the point of Tomaso's sword swept under it with a flash like lightning and laid open the cheek of the duelist straight down to the neck. Then bounded back and stood with the blade of his sword classed in his left hand staring at his astounded foe. It was the quickest thing I ever saw. The wound was a disfiguring one, but by no means dangerous. The presence of blood satis-fied the honor that had been so violently outraged that night. There was a conventional hand sheking and a moment later we were rolling back to town. I don't think we had been out of the carriage six minutes. The amazement of the duelist was so complete that I doubt if he realizes to this day what had occurred, and the hilarity of the three Angle-Saxons who had made up the party of the young Cutan extended far into the following The ignorance of Tomaso had saved him, for no man with a knowledge of fencing would have exposed himself as he did in that furious enslaught.—Blakely Hall in New York World.

Buffalo Bill on the Cowboy.

I should greatly like to say a few words respecting a topic which I much regret to find is understood in the inverse proportion to which it is discussed. I refer to that unique specimen of humanity, the cowboy of today. In order to be brief I will, like a cowboy, take the bull by the horns, and lay down the axiom, once for all, and most emphatically, that a cowboy is not a blackguard; nay, more, he is in nine cases out of ten better than his fellows, more especially as in nine cases out of ten his fellows are the offspring of an effete civilization. He has certain attrioutes that commend him to creation. is manly, generous and brave. He is not merely a creature of impulse, but uses the gifts given him by his Maker with a discretion which might well be copied by more of us. In putting in these few words for a class of men who have only to be understood to be admired, I speak after years of study resulting in a conviction which nothing can shake.-London Globe Interview.

"Soldiering" in a Band.

Yes, there is such a thing as "soldiering" in a band, and it frequently happens that there are several of the players gaged in it at the same time. In a large band it is a very easy matter for a player to hold the end of his instrument to his mouth and create the impression that he is playing his part when he is not. In parades a great deal of this is done. also practiced largely in string bands. man whose duty it was to manipulate the big bass violin in Gilmore's band soldiered throughout the whole perform-ance.—Musician in Globe-Democrat.
